Introducing Digital Image Output In earlier chapters, you learned how to copy and paste images from one computer to another or transfer them from a scanner or digital camera to a computer. You also learned how to use Photoshop to manipulate an image once it's in a digital format. When you're ready to output the image, you need to make sure the file that's going into your output device is compatible with the device. In this chapter, you discover the different types of digital output you can use to create images and learn what output devices you can use to output images. You also learn about the basics of image resolution and aspect ratio, which is the ratio of the width to the height of a printed image.

Background ===== Previous studies indicate that marked decreases in regional cerebral blood flow (CBF) to the parietal lobe were noted in the early phase of STICH-LONGA study \[@B1\]. A central mechanism could play an important role in the pathogenesis of subarachnoid hemorrhage (SAH). The aim of this study is to investigate the role of a microvascular injury in the pathogenesis of SAH. Methods ===== A total of 23 patients who had a positive SAH grade on CT scan in the early phase of SAH were enrolled into the study. The left middle cerebral artery (MCA) territory was chosen for evaluation of cerebral blood flow (CBF) in the early phase of the study. CBF to both gray matter (GM) and white matter (WM) of the MCA territory was determined by magnetic resonance imaging (MRI). The patients were also evaluated by TCD before and 3 hours after the onset of SAH. CBF was measured in the MCA and the precuneus as well as the frontal and temporal cortex. Results ===== CBF measured in the MCA and precuneus decreased significantly from 101.7 ± 18.1 ml/100 g/min before SAH to 59.5 ± 11.3 ml/100 g/min 3 hours later. There was a significant correlation between CBF at 3 hours after the onset of SAH and the neurological grade, the Hunt and Hess grade, and Fisher grade at 24 hours after SAH. In patients without intraparenchymal hematoma, CBF in the MCA and precuneus significantly decreased at 3 hours after the onset of SAH, but in patients with intraparenchymal hematoma, CBF in the MCA and precuneus increased after 3 hours and were significantly higher than those with no intraparenchymal hematoma. Changes in CBF in other regions were not observed in both two groups. Conclusion ===== These results suggest that decrease in CBF in the early phase of SAH is a common phenomenon regardless of hematoma formation. However, it is possible that vasodilation to compensate for hypoperfusion by a central mechanism might occur in patients without intraparenchymal hematoma.
