Just like the title says, when I pour concrete, the mix isn't smooth, its like little "cracks" from the time I start mixing to the time I set the slab into place. It creates a really ugly sound when the slab is set. No particular type of concrete. I mix with one of the cheaper places so I never got to be picky about it. I tried to use 2 types of concrete to see if it would change, but it just made the problem worse. And I never had a problem like this before. This is one of my later mixes: A: Crumbly sound typically means you have a shortage of portland cement. Typically that means there are not enough clinker fines (the sharp particles that are the main aggregate in Portland cement). Most slab mixes I make have a ratio of Portland cement to clinker of about 1 to 2, maybe 3. When making a mixture it helps to use a knife or power mixer to mix them first. This way you can see that the mortar doesn't stay too high in the mix when you pour. If it is staying high in the mix, the portland cement may be sticking out and can cause lumps in the concrete. A: Making sure that the whole mess is turning into a stiff paste before you pour is a huge part of making sure that the slab is poured with a good surface. I've found that an inexpensive tool made by a former employer of mine for grinding aggregate to be really great. The way I like to measure the consistency of a mix is to measure out the slurry into a bucket of water. Then stir and let
