Confronted with the Cuban missile crisis, Kremlin officials have stated that the Soviet Union was ready to use nuclear weapons, if necessary, to defend the Soviet Union against an American attack. By January 1961, however, the Russians could no longer get the missiles they wanted and by the spring the U-2 spy plane had detected a full-scale Soviet nuclear arms buildup. Accordingly, at a meeting of the Politburo on March 5, the Soviet leader, Nikita Khrushchev, announced the construction of a full-scale "Wall of Jericho" around the Soviet Union. It was originally designed as a 100-mile-wide trench stretching from the Baltic to the Black Sea. By the end of March, Soviet troops had begun to dig the wall, which was to be 1,200 miles long. The terrain that the Russian generals had to cross was largely mountainous; as a result, they would have to blast their way through the landscape. In addition, the Russians would have to cross some of their largest rivers and sewers. The Russians were determined to continue the work despite the conditions. The border between East and West Germany, which was primarily a military barrier, had been secured, but the new Soviet construction would effectively block off the Berlin area altogether. In a sign of how serious the Soviet Union was, their best shot at stopping the wall was to keep the United States from interfering with the project. Thus, when JFK asked whether or not there were any other ways to resolve the problem, Soviet leaders were able to respond firmly and say no. On June 25, however, the Soviets declared that the wall was "free of mines" and that all border guards, including those from the West and those from the East, were to stand down. This re-established the pre-war status quo. In a statement, President Kennedy said, "On this peaceful evening the world watches a great and historic moment.... We must now help our red brothers and sisters to understand that the wall of Jericho has been breached.... On this day we are fifty years away from the original sin of World War II, and the historical task is not only to restore full relations, not only to stop the East-West conflict, but to settle all disputes.... With the help of the West, this historic task is now being f
