1. Field of the Invention The invention relates to a fuel metering device for internal combustion engines in which a pump duct has an electric variable displacement pump, the driven shaft of which is driven by an intermediate shaft of the internal combustion engine, the variable displacement pump acting on a pressure chamber connected to a low pressure reservoir and connected to a suction line in a bypass arrangement, so that a metered fuel flow is delivered to an intake manifold and an outlet duct of the pump chamber acts as a metering duct.

2. Description of the Prior Art For internal combustion engines that are equipped with metering devices of the above-mentioned type, these metering devices are subjected to high pressure and temperature fluctuations. In accordance with the fuel injection systems which have been conventionally used in internal combustion engines, the fuel flow rate is determined by a predeterminable control pressure in a control valve which is actuated by an electronic control unit and is proportional to the control pressure. This control pressure is either produced by a pump force that is built up in a driver piston of an electromagnetically operated pump or a check valve system. These conditions lead to difficulties in the operation of the metering device and to correspondingly higher fuel flow rates.
