What's new in TRANCE VR:

All My Side There she stood, a silhouette against the cold, sweltering darkness. Her eyes were flint as she glared at him, fingers tight into the tangled flame of her emerald cuffs. They weren't a full nine days, but she could nonetheless recognize their strides. She'd been too wrapped up in Art to notice yet that the nights were cooler than normal, a welcome relief after the merciless heat of the day. But with the wind down in December, she could feel the icy waves crashing against the dock with equal force, though the temperature wasn't high enough to make them more than a faint sigh in the distance. The constant pulse of the ocean was a restless music of desire, painting the ever-present desolation of the docks with a thin bluish tint. It was all so peaceful, but for the wind, and that it was broken. When she'd spotted him, Luca's breathing had already quickened with anticipation. Yes, he'd been waiting for this day for a long time now - the apprehension, the impatience had been with him since last winter - but the actual night was a face-healer's cure for years of stress and desire. He hadn't needed summer's warmth and beautiful days to release his frustration, hadn't needed to rise at dawn to clean his bow and climb his ship to catch the whispering waves. He hadn't needed to wait for the warm night to sneak up on him - it already had. When she'd come into sight, just after the full moon had tipped over the red horizon, Luca had caught in the instant both cold and tautness to his breath. He was here, he had come. But where was she going? Fingers still tight, the emerald cuffs dripping with burning oil that she'd had her brother bring from the market yesterday, Feena slowly stepped into motion towards him, shaking her hair free of the binds of her bonnet. Not a step, not even a half-step. Not even a single graceful curve in her gait. No, she stumbled along, arms tight against her body, eyes burning into his with a hatred that seared him deep into his beating heart. If she didn't move, if she could find a way to ignore the noises of the night, Luca thought he might

Killer is the story of an unarmed man that is about to be gunned down by a cop. The game features a fantastic reaction engine, giving the player a lot of freedom. You can react to the situation in many different ways. You can defend yourself, attempt to kill the cops in revenge or you can even try to escape. In Killer you can get a gun, and kill the police or gangsters as you see fit. The game was made by a small dev team and consists of several parts that unlock when you get good enough. You also need to accumulate money to buy weapons and boost your skills. The game has no AI, meaning that you are in complete control of everything. If you feel like going on a killing spree, go ahead and kill more than 10 people. But be careful! When there's a shootout a cop will shoot you with a shotgun even if you're unarmed. You can defend yourself by shooting his gun. If this action is successful you will get a reputation to be less vulnerable for being a cop killer. The way you carry out your actions in Killer is very intuitive, and more players feel comfortable playing the game. The hit detection works well, as you can hit an opponent regardless of whether the target is actually hit. This is greatly facilitated by a quick hit where you press your direction and then get an indicator that tells you where you just hit your target. This is very handy, especially as you find weapons on the street that shoot bullets in a long range. As you progress through the game you can gain stats for every action you carry out. Doing, for example, a lot of "bullet killings" is rewarded with a rank upgrade. The different actions are tied to the different stats, so by all means, practice! You can also buy and upgrade weapons to increase your options. For example, most people have a shotgun that can only damage one opponent at a time. But let's say that you shoot the lead out of his shotgun and he is not able to fire any longer. Then you can still hit him with another shotgun without your own weapon slowing down. You can also use your money to upgrade the "bullet killing" action so you can hit more bullets. Other weapons also affect the stats. More Details Killer gives you a different experience. The game feels like it is mainly about "keeping your game life". When you have a limited amount of time
