Garden Made by Katie Rogers - The Basics The great thing about planning a plant display is you have time to think of all the things about it, like how many make it to the party? Are there always enough for everyone? Are there plants that are too tall or wide? What should the look be? Let's start with the basics. There are three types of decorations if we're going to be honest. Throw stuff on the porch or tree and be done, save your energy for to-ing and fro-ing. Things are more fun if you get to bring in the big guns: lookbooks, full-page ads, etc. Luckily for you, I'm going to give you the best of the best. This guide will help you make a really classy and sophisticated display that's not just for Halloween, but a proper centerpiece in your home year-round. Choose something simple and classic for your porch, or something eye-catching for your living room. My favorite Halloween garden is below. My favorite thing about this fall arrangement is that each arrangement is already lit at night. That gives the illusion that the arrangement is lit throughout the night. I imagine this style of holiday displays will be big the following year too. I don't know if I've thought that far ahead, or if this display is a trend that will never go out of style. But for now, let's look at how to do it yourself. The first thing to do for a garden is to choose a theme. If you're bright, try a scheme that has color coordinated plants so they'll look good together. If you're dark in spirit, go with a moody, eclectic look. Look at any interior design magazine, magazines for garden beds, and get inspiration. Space is very limited in my house, but I used some 6-9 feet of bookcase. I used a wooden rail that I had from another of my gardens which sat taller but was too tall for my living room area. I added seven planters. The open space at the top of the post was left empty for now. I add plants to it in the spring when everything is tidy. You'll want to figure out where you want to put the garden and then cut out an area or plant beds around that. Lay the planters in the plan you came up with and then fill them. Make sure to space them out right, an half-dozen inches apart from one
