Get ready for the fiercest battle in the world! Become a rebel fighter! In the extremely powerful future, you will train your skills. And a lot! Friday, May 13, 2011 Los Angeles: Passwords exist for almost every website, whether the site is big or small, whether it belongs to a giant corporation or a local community or even a blog about your dog. In one of the most obvious ways imaginable, information that people enter into their computers, smartphones and other devices is captured by a vast network of machines that automate what would be manually very time-consuming tasks. How much of that information can be useful to hackers and other data thieves remains a closely held secret, and one group that has access to more of it than the rest is the U.S. Federal Bureau of Investigation. The FBI has for several years been quietly loosening restrictions on sharing information gathered by the thousands of computer terminals it has placed across the country. The FBI has not yet shared most of that information with the rest of the government. But security researchers said in interviews they have been provided access to much of the data. Some of it has helped them catch criminals, and other times the criminals have caught the researchers. The use of the criminal's online identity is not by itself a problem, but the more a criminal appears to use an online identity, the more such information tends to gather around him. "When criminals are trying to avoid detection, they tend to do so by using a phony identity," said Ian Crawford, director of GigaSpaces's security research lab. "The more we know about that phony identity, the better we can thwart them." The problem with the FBI is it has not been forthcoming about just how much information it shares. The agency declined to respond to requests for more information about how it deals with data collected from its electronic gadgets. The FBI started a pilot program to broaden its sharing in 2010 that was expanded the following year, according to records obtained by Reuters under a Freedom of Information Act request. The agency declined to make the records available, saying they are subject to a deliberative process exemption. But Tom O'Rourke, an information security consultant and executive director of the Infragard law enforcement security group, said he understood the agency was trying to find a balance between catching criminals and protecting people's civil liberties. "As soon as a website turns over the right data to the FBI, it's

2 Boys Threesome Damon Wayans is a likeable, wholesome guy with a good face, and he looks how you'd expect a guy in a movie directed by a white guy in a major studio would look: kinda like a generic piece of central casting, and a little bit like that guy from Family Guy. It's a lot to live up to, but Wayans walks the line, proving that he's not just a pretty face or token non-threatening guy who blends in well in a crowd. Wayans fits the physical description of the gruff, blustery good ol' boy we've already seen in Out of Sight, and some of the role-playing where he must do things like slap women around and slap women in heat, which is an unusual circumstance for him: it's a role reversal. He does these things, but only because he's been told to do these things, and that role-play comes off as forced and weird. Then there are situations involving women who seek revenge for being slapped around, or who won't stop hitting the guy for doing what the guy agrees to do. "I got paid to act like that and fuck around? Like I have any choice?" Wayans says. Or as he says, smoking the weed that brought along the two attractive young actresses, "just do my show, man!" But of course, in these best-selling porn books where these stories are told about 400 ways, the women get their revenge. Revenge, the men come out unscathed. And my favorite quote from the book/movie is supposed to come from a hot-as-blazes female porn star, "If we can't be a women, we can still be a weapon." One of the voices in the editing and production credits for this made-for-TV movie says: if the porn industry wanted to dispel myths, they'd give these videos a sexual overtone in the packaging and labeling. But they don't. They package and label it as straight or hardcore. So, the three men take the two attractive (and expensive) women to three different apartments to do their thing. It's not nice, it's not clean, and it's not classy. If I was one of the guys, I
