Composing mass mail messages is something which, in daily life, happens time and time again. Whether you're working into a fast-paced business environment or you're just confronted with large volumes of mail requests and tasks daily, having a solution for composing and sending emails in batches is key for efficiency. Personal Office Mailer will provide users with a solution for defining email templates or newsletters, extract mailing lists and send the created messages to several recipients simultaneously, all in the context of an Outlook environment. Load your local contacts database or extract them from your Outlook account Users have the option of choosing if they use a locally stored database contact or the internal one present in their installation of Microsoft Outlook. For the local databases, one can either use an XLS or CSV file or an Access format database. Loading either of the latter will allow one to preview its contents and perform sorting and selections using the preferred criteria. Furthermore, one also has the option of saving the performed selection, for later use. Define email templates and select details such as importance, attachments or the preferred recipients The app's built-in email message composers allows users to define the characteristics of batch messages or newsletters if that is the end purpose of the message. Classic formatting tools are provided for the actual text body and other relevant aspects can be tweaked to further enhance the overall process. These include attachments, recipient list, importance or even reading confirmation. Although it manages to provide a decent amount of features, the app lacks diversity in terms of actual settings available, and this might be bothersome for more advanced users. It comprises seven songs for soprano solo and string quartet, dealing with the subject of "Cosmic poetry", i.e. the "poetic image of the universe, the magnificence of all creation". The songs are performed by Helen Watts in English, with a programme note by composer Harrison Birtwistle. The composer describes the work as a "serious, instinctive and world-wide musical memory" which can be performed "everywhere – for people, for animals, for nature, or for art" and as "unthreatening" as "it dispenses with the symbolic and the epic, looking only at the everyday but extraordinary multiplicity of the physical world" without giving "in any way the impression of preaching, or of any underlying message". Watts said that the soprano has "a kind of responsibility" to create through song-speaking that which is "moving, inexorable and unavoidable": Performance history Watts' first recording of the cycle was with Naxos Records in 1996, together with the song cycle Imago Caeli from five years earlier, and she repeated the recording in 2001.
