GameDesk liked Reach for the Sun's design because it adds a new perspective on the evolution of plants by illustrating the relationship between growth and flowering and the ways that roots, leaves, flowers, and pollen are connected. Most people aren't aware of the complexity of the plant body. Reach for the Sun draws that out. It's part of the large-scale goal of GameDesk, which is to see the link between gaming and learning. Games that can be used in the classroom are a valuable part of that. The graphics are beautiful, and they come together well with the gameplay. The graphics also fit well with the concept of the game. We're very focused on helping kids to become more aware of how different types of plants grow and to learn how they connect. Reach for the Sun: Grow with Reach for the Sun! In Reach for the Sun, players have to guide an avatar through the world. It's a game about exploration and growth. Plants have different abilities as players progress through the game. Can you grow an apple tree or a giant mushroom? Maybe even a vine? The story unfolds in real time as players interact with the world, and they learn the functions of plants through a story that is narrated through the game. Reach for the Sun is designed so it can be played at any time of day and with no prior knowledge. Players in Reach for the Sun interact with plants by rolling various buttons. This is a fast-paced game, but it's also pretty forgiving, so you don't need to memorize a lot of steps in order to play. Plants can be broken down in different ways, but you only need to know the basic parts. The game is designed to teach some concepts through the progression of plants. The main point of this game is to demonstrate the changes that take place when plants grow and change into different forms. But if you're looking for something much more different, you might also want to check out Reach for the Sun's music video! [above image: reachforthesunvideo.com] Reach for the Sun: Reach for the Sun has received lots of praise from critics and educators. Mark DeLoura [Senior Advisor, White House Digital Media Office] (Washington, D.C.): I'm very glad to see that Reach for the Sun has received such positive reviews. When I spoke to senior educators about Reach for the Sun, they all thought it

What's new:

loof The venerable Linesloof brims with ideas every time I watch the show, and while I admire them, ultimately I just can't see giving my money to a company whose founders' ideas I don't completely like. But, you know, the good products aren't universally wonderful, and this line of bracing marine scotches is a lot of fun. Stated simply, Kanapaha is a large vessel whose lines are starkly appropriate for heavy use and rough conditions. The hull is steel, the planks are glued well with epoxy, the sheer is checkerboard-patterned red-and-white, and the yacht is measured at 33 ft by 8.25 ft. If you'd like to know more about our first Linesloof yard, please head here. We certainly have much to like about this remarkably well-built vessel. Like all Shipsloof vessels, the Kanapaha, a rimbo, is light, capable of long periods at sea, and built for hard conditions. But the detail is that, in addition to rimbo pragmatics, Linesloof knows how to cram a lot of soul into a hull. I'm including on-video commentary for the specific purpose of explaining, why in the first place, I'm not so keen on Linesloof designs. But the added commentary will be drowned out by a flurry of checklist items: big strong steel hull, enhanced hull protection, rust-detection coating of naturally-derived alucinum, and a very nice epoxy-glue procedure incorporating best-in-class qualities that make this hulling and bonding far superior to in-yard hulling techniques. And the novelty of alucinum, a marine-grade glue derived from marine plants, is an endless source of fascination for me. First, hulling with alucinum is much better for the environment than in-yard hulling and offers the advantage of not requiring disposal of toxic waste. In fact, if you've followed the Kanapaha build, you know that ours is the first rimbo to undergo full in-depth hulling with the alucinum. Understandably, since we're magicians in the marine yachting world, we're providing our customers with the opportunity to use alucinum hulling. The rest of the team's most recent project, described Hell on Earth is an RPG campaign system that blends the epic and the absurd. The characters are inmates in a hellish prison for doing "harmful" things in the outside world. They spend their time worrying about their own fates, but also fighting monsters and demons and getting in trouble with the government. Within their prison walls is a hub of activity, from the almost-impossible to impossible, and the game encourages players to explore these options. This project is the complete set of portraits for Fantasy Grounds. Don't forget to check out the full contents of the Hell on Earth Figures Pack for Fantasy Grounds here.
