What if that breakpoint or event isn't even supported by what you're running? That's where the built-in debugger comes in. It's a lot like an interactive web development tool. It can pause execution at a chosen location, see what function is currently being executed, and examine the variables of that function and the global environment. This tutorial shows you how to use it. Note: Debugger is a separate app from Xcode; you need to install it yourself. Debugger Functions Sometimes, you need to pause execution temporarily to set a breakpoint. GDB supports a breakpoint command for this purpose. You can also view the program's stack by examining the stack frames. You can trace function calls by simply typing the name of the function. (C,G)CTRL-D: Debugger window You can start, suspend, terminate and restart any active debugging sessions. You can view the content of the global environment (variables, strings, etc.) and you can debug your own code. Searching for a function Debugger provides a "find in files" and "find in list" function. You can search for a file by name, line number, or function name. For instance, if you want to view what a function does, you can type its name into the "Find in files" search area. The debugger can also search for you, even when you aren't debugging. Global environment The global environment is a list of variables in your program and in the active debugging session. For instance, if you were debugging and you stopped execution on a breakpoint, you'd see the variables in the debug window that correspond to the line that was on breakpoint. Find in files Searches through files for a given string. Make sure the file argument is correct and that the search is restricted to the active debugging session
