We also allow the uncertainty over the accepted answers to grow as the program goes on. We observe that the more the uncertainty about the results, the more the students struggle. Note that the precise results given by the contestant are irrelevant as long as their correctness is consistent. On the other hand, [e.g.]{}, a program that always output the wrong answer is not a sensible solution because this program might be the "solution" expected by the exam committee. More precisely, our method of incorporating the notion of truth value into a knowledge based assessment consists of the following steps: 1. For a program $p$, compute a [guess]{} ${\mathit{guess}}(p)$ of its truth value. 2. For each problem, select a set of possible solutions according to the given instructions. 3. Given the problem, find a solution $S$ which represents a member of this set such that the following holds: 1. if $p$ "came in" to the problem and $S$ is the "correct" answer, then $${\mathit{guess}}(S) = {\mathit{guess}}(p)$$ 2. if $p$ "came in" to the problem and $S$ is one of the answers that $p$ has chosen, then $${\math 0cc13bf012
