A small genetic change may help to halt the progress of a rare form of motor neuron disease, the first ever shown to be hereditary, researchers have revealed. The gene they studied, which has no known function, is one of two that likely let Charles Best develop his ailment. He died in 1958, and because the disorder is almost unheard of among the descendants of his descendants – the disease is known to be transmitted in an autosomal recessive manner – finding one of his genes had been completely unexpected. Myelin protection Best was a British neurologist who made some of the most influential contributions to the knowledge of the motor pathways in the brain. He also isolated the protein now called neuroserpin – which helps the myelin sheath that surrounds the nerve fibres act like a lubricant to aid the flow of electrical signals. Many other genetic mutations are known to affect the production of this protein and all seem to be linked with certain types of cancers, but in Best's case, the presence of the abnormal copy of the gene does not seem to affect his health until later on. "We don't know whether it's that way for other people," says David Sinclair, a geneticist at Harvard Medical School in Boston, Massachusetts, who has used gene-editing techniques to discover how some "orphan" genetic variants lead to disease. Sinclair's latest study is published in the journal Science. Re-imagined The scientists said they had discovered another way that the gene could work, by helping to keep nerves insulated. Although neuroserpin looks like it might play a role in the body's immune system, its discovery was such a surprise that they first thought it might be working on something else entirely. "I was surprised by this," says Sinclair. "You can imagine using a serum that coats the nerve fibres and lubricates the signal ... this is sort of an unusual function for neuroserpin." It's still not clear how the mutation leads to the disease, which also causes muscle wasting. But in humans the mutation works in an identical way to a gene that causes Pelizaeus-Merzbacher disease in mice, and that produces an enzyme that produces a substance called laminin which protects the myelin sheath – although that research in mice has not yet been replicated in humans. Scientists have also found that the

[The value of computed tomography in the preoperative staging of gastric cancer]. Patients suffering from gastric carcinoma should be examined primarily by computed tomography (CT) of the abdomen in order to establish the extent of the local tumor invasion and to estimate the resectability of the malignant lesion. In 85% of all patients the CT scans can demonstrate the depth of tumor infiltration into the gastric wall. The CT scans are of limited value for an exact staging of the lymph-node metastases. In 29% of the patients the CT scans are falsely positive and in 16% falsely negative. The follow-up CT scan after 5 and 10 months can demonstrate a reduction of tumor size in 6% and 31%, respectively. Q: MySQL - Local Time to GMT Time Conversion I am trying to convert a time from a TimeZone, "Local Time (UNIX Time)", to GMT time. I have the following query: `SELECT DATE('time') FROM `table1` WHERE `time` > UNIX_TIMESTAMP(1376080800)` It returns "2013-03-19" for example, which is correct. I tried altering it to the following and it does not work: `SELECT DATE('time') FROM `table1` WHERE `time` > UNIX_TIMESTAMP(1376080800) + TIME_ZONE('GMT', '-6')`; It says: #1241 - Operand should contain 1 column(s) I'm sure I'm missing something basic but I can't figure out what it is. Thanks in advance! A: Your second query is incorrect. UNIX_TIMESTAMP(1376080800) converts the time that is 1376080800 seconds into UNIX time. For your date to be exactly 1366080800 seconds after midnight, it would have to be 13.76080800 seconds after midnight in GMT. (You can work this out yourself.) You can't add a zone offset to the end of it, because the UNIX_TIMESTAMP returns a UNIX time, which means "8:00PM on date" is not the same as "8:00PM in GMT time". Either subtract time_zone from the timestring first, before using it in any function that might treat it as a string, or
