A host of inflammatory and prothrombotic biomarkers have been studied for clinical utility in several disease states, including myocardial infarction (MI). The majority of previous biomarker studies have consistently found significant incremental prognostic value with the addition of biomarkers to established clinical risk factors (RF), but the added predictive value has been modest. Whether this represents a flaw in the biomarker assessment or results from technical limitations of the study design is unclear. A major factor may be the inconsistency among previous findings of biomarker prognostic importance. Although several biomarkers are commonly studied, not all follow a similar performance trajectory. Myocardial infarction is a prototypical disease in which the identification of incremental prognostic value of a novel biomark 6d1f23a050
