The underutilization of existing supply chains for general internal medicine by community health centers: a case study of interprofessional primary care. There is a mismatch between the supply of primary care services and the projected demand. Understanding the reasons for poor access and coordinating solutions to improve access are essential. This study identified how community health centers coordinate existing supply chains for general internal medicine services to provide evidence-based, cost-effective, and comprehensive primary care. The authors conducted a retrospective chart review of patient encounters to examine patients' socioeconomic status and primary language. Primary care providers were surveyed to learn where and how they refer patients, collaborate, and coordinate care. Results showed that patients who were referred to interprofessional health centers were twice as likely to have a primary language other than English, have Medicaid or Medicare, or belong to an underserved community. Primary care providers reported that only 56% of
