phalanges, and also of the first and second thoracic ribs. As shown in the images of Figure 1{ref-type="fig"} (e-h), the soft tissue component appears to be a condensation of the pharyngeal and cranioventral neck soft tissues. From a treatment perspective, the most important part in the bilateral pharyngeal soft-tissue preservation and neck contouring is the initial incision and flap design. The flap design should be placed in front of the hyoid bone, inferior to the plane of the digastricus. Keeping the inferior border of the flap slightly superomedial to the hyoid bone facilitates the dissection of the flap and avoids breaching of the cricothyroid membrane. Finally, the incision plane should have a slight to moderate degree of lateral extension toward the tumor bed; otherwise, the result is potentially a recurrence of the cancer. In our center, the vital structures in the neck were tentatively or actually preserved by leaving the paraglottic and paratracheal spaces and the internal jugular vein and artery. Preservation of the internal jugular vein and artery in most cases decreases the length of the neck incision and facilitates the dissection of the flap, especially in cases with extensive infiltration of the neck soft tissues. The use of the left internal jugular vein may facilitate the flap rotation over the left side and may decrease the length of the incision on the left side. In the present study, we observed that almost all of the patients required additional procedures after the application of the neck-flap surgery, such as re-excisions and/or neck dissection. Before the application of neck flap surgery, all of the patients were preoperatively evaluated by MDCT to find out whether they had infiltrated the cervical vertebrae and whether they had extended to the chest or shoulder. In our experience, the low-dose CT scanning (i.e., 80 kVp and 6 mA) yielded similar
