In an era of artificial intelligence, it seems simple to game the stock market. People will generally keep their trading strategies to themselves if they aren't sure of their methods. With the rise in popularity of algorithmic trading, it's not unheard of for Wall Streeters to talk and crack whips or even form teams with each other. Some years ago, we reported on a number of algorithms that demonstrated similar stock market strategies. The trouble is, those articles were

years ago. We've seen quite a bit of progress with regard to the very skills that were employed in those early days. And this is the point where the smart money says that is when this robotic army will begin to spread its wings. We've already seen the first steps. As we recently reported, algorithmic trading platforms are now the second largest way that people participate in the stock market. Think about this for a moment: the number of people that engage in the stock market is roughly the same as the number of people that engage in algorithmic trading. A lot of people are getting involved in an old method of trading. The future isn't quite as rosy as it might seem. The very reason the algorithmic trading platform is growing is because of the shortage of quantitative analysts. There's quite a strong correlation between the decline in the jobs that require quantitative skills, and the growth of algorithmic trading platforms. The truth is that it doesn't take many people at all to reap huge benefits from algorithmic trading platforms. It's quite possible that, very soon, a lot more people will be cheating the system. In other words, we've already seen some groups of Wall Streeters that are actively engaged in this. We've seen this at times when we've seen some dips that shouldn't be there. The truth is that even the biggest quant hedge
