FILE PHOTO: The electronic keypad of a front door is seen in this image provided by the U.S. Capitol Police in Washington, U.S. on February 10, 2017. U.S. Capitol Police/Handout via REUTERS/File Photo The woman, a Russian national, has been identified in official court filings and media reports as Valentina V. She was arrested on Sept. 25, 2018, by the FBI and charged with "enter[ing] the Capitol Building of the United States in order to communicate and transmit national defense information to the Russian Federation," according to court papers. She has not yet entered a plea, and her attorney in Washington has not responded to requests for comment. A defense attorney in Moscow did not respond to requests for comment. The arrest was first reported by the Daily Caller, a conservative news website. The arrest came as U.S. investigators sought to prove whether the Russian woman had been involved in passing on intelligence to Russian President Vladimir Putin's government. The arrest also came at a time when U.S. officials were considering whether and how to retaliate against individuals from Russia, including members of the GRU, Russia's military intelligence agency, who they say carried out cyber attacks against the U.S. presidential election in 2016. It is not clear when she was arrested or what she was doing c6a93da74d
