Almost all regurgitation jets are due to posterior leaflet tethering or prolapse \[@R1\]. However, the mechanism of tricuspid valve regurgitation usually is right ventricular pressure overload related to tricuspid annular dilation, annular dilatation, and distortion \[@R1\]. The mechanism for left ventricular outflow tract regurgitation is thought to be the consequence of systolic anterior movement of the mitral valve, and the mechanism for mitral valve annular dilation is not known. Rarely, an isolated mitral valve regurgitation has been reported \[@R18\]. The diagnosis and the severity of the mitral regurgitation depends on evaluation of signs and symptoms and clinical evaluation that will be discussed later in this case report. According to the NYHA classification, mitral regurgitation is considered as functional mitral regurgitation if the symptoms and signs are mild or absent \[@R12\]. In contrast, mitral regurgitation is considered as organic if the symptoms and signs cannot be explained only by the mitral regurgitation \[@R12\]. Most of the cases of the mitral valve prolapse with the variable morphology reported in the literature are in women between the ages of 20 and 40 c6a93da74d
